ERRATA.

Page 3. for Sir Wm. Jones, read the Rev. Wm. Jones.

Page 91. To our statement in the account of New London Bridge, that its smallest arches exceed the largest of any other stone bridge in the world, the words "of the same form," should have been added. The new bridge recently erected over the Dee, at Chester, and one or two more, exceed the span of the largest arch of London Bridge, but are of a different form. To correspondents who have questioned the accuracy of some dates in this article, we have to reply, that the date assigned in it to the opening of Westminster Bridge is perfectly correct; that given to the laying the first stone of the Southwark Bridge is a typographical error, as the context of the phrase will show.

Page 170. The "Cockfighter's Garland." We are requested to state, on the authority of a highly respectable gentleman now living, that the circumstance on which Cowper founded this poem, is not only exaggerated, but in several respects falsified. The cock was thrown upon the fire, but immediately flew off unhurt; and so far from Mr. Ardesoif dying in the way described, he lived for a considerable time afterwards, and frequently expressed to our informant and others, his bitter regret for the cruel deed. The article was, as stated, copied into the Saturday Magazine from the Voice of Humanity, and the conductors of that work will no doubt gladly avail themselves of the opportunity afforded by this contradiction of putting the truth upon record.
